

the present war he was immediately promoted Major of the Third Battalion, Fourth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, commanding Companies G, B, C and F. The Major is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution and of the Society of the War of 1812. His noble blood has been represented in every war of this country. His father was an officer of Artillery in the Prussian Army. His paternal grandfather was an adjutant under Napoleon Bonaparte. The Major has work to sustain his name, but the Major has the enterprise to make easy that work.

The Boys of The Regiment.

As an outgrowth of the war with Spain, no blessing, in God's providence is a more prominent or important element of strength to the nation than bringing the different sections together, which, a little while ago, were at variance. The northern man has seen for himself the southern man in his home—on his native soil. He has been kindly received and cordially welcomed by him to his southern home. And the boys of this regiment have shown a good element of manly citizenship, if not the best in their State. By their proud deportment and honor they have overcome for their section, a prejudice that could not otherwise have been averted.

Seated beside an honest sergeant of this regiment a short while ago, in the enjoyment of a superb cup of coffee, we remarked, "How much better it was than whiskey." "No," said the sergeant, "Whiskey is the better drink." "Surely," we said, "We are not out of sympathy so soon. We thought from the high tone of the Wisconsin boys, that they would entirely ignore the use of whiskey." "No, no," he said "We only
